

Breaking News English.com

Ditch neckties to save energy, says Spain's PM – 1st August, 2022

Level 4

Spain's leader has asked people to not wear neckties to save energy and help the planet. Pedro Sanchez addressed journalists tieless at a press conference. He called on Spaniards to follow his lead. He stated: "I have asked all ministers and public decision-makers to [go tieless]. That means we can all save energy." He added that the private sector should also not wear a tie. He said: "In that way, we will all be contributing to the energy savings that are so necessary."

Spain is adopting "urgent" energy-saving measures to tackle the climate crisis. It also wants to cut its reliance on Russian gas because of the Ukraine War. Mr Sanchez's government has already restricted the use of air conditioners and heaters. Spain has introduced a relief package of $9.2 billion to help people with energy bills. More than 500 people have died in Spain in the past two weeks because of ongoing heatwaves.

Level 5

Spain's Prime Minister has urged citizens to ditch their neckties to help save energy and the planet. Pedro Sanchez made his plea at a press conference. He addressed journalists tieless, and called on Spaniards to follow his lead in ditching his tie. He stated: "I have asked all ministers and public decision-makers to [go tieless]. That means we can all save energy." He added: "I would also like to ask the private sector that...they should not wear a tie either because, in that way, we will all be contributing to the energy savings that are so necessary for our country."

Spain will soon adopt "urgent" energy-saving measures to tackle the climate crisis, and to cut its reliance on Russian gas. Other European countries are moving away from Russian fuel because of the Ukraine War. Sanchez's government has already restricted the use of air conditioners and heating appliances in workplaces. The recent heatwaves and rising energy prices have taken their toll in Spain. More than 500 people have died in the past two weeks because of the heat. Spain has also introduced a relief package of $9.2 billion to help people with energy bills.

Level 6

Spain's Prime Minister Pedro Sanchez has urged his fellow citizens to ditch their neckties to help save energy and the planet. Mr Sanchez made his plea at a press conference on Friday. He addressed journalists tieless, and called on Spanish people to follow his lead amid the country's months-long heatwave. He stated: "I would like you to see that I am not wearing a tie. I have asked all ministers and public decision-makers to do likewise. That means we can all save energy." He added: "I would also like to ask the private sector that...they should not wear a tie either because, in that way, we will all be contributing to the energy savings that are so necessary for our country."

Mr Sanchez said Spain would soon adopt "urgent" energy-saving measures to tackle the climate crisis, and to reduce its reliance on Russian gas. Many other European countries are doing what they can to be less dependent on Russia for fuel in the wake of the Ukraine War. It is as yet unclear what actions Mr Sanchez will take to save energy. His government has already set restrictions on the use of air conditioners and heating appliances in the workplace. The recent heatwaves and rising energy prices have taken their toll on Spain. More than 500 people have passed away in the past two weeks because of the heat. Spain has also introduced a relief package of $9.2 billion to help people pay energy bills.